

In a year of immense and unparalleled uncertainty, next week—next month—will be especially challenging. At Liberation in a Generation, we remain undeterred in the demand for a Liberation Economy. No matter the outcome in the days ahead, our work will endure. Oppression is relentless, and so too is our fight for the liberation of Black, Latinx, Indigenous, Asian, and Pacific Islander people. Soon, we are launching Liberation in a Generation Action, which will work to push elected officials to build an economy for people of color. Stay tuned.

#LiberationEconomy2021: Join us tomorrow for a Twitter chat on the fight against austerity in the unfolding COVID-19 recession, which is hurting people of color in unequal ways. With less than a week until the 2020 Election, it's crucial to lay out how we intend to win economic liberation for us in a generation. Meet us at @LiberationIn at 1pm ET/10am PT.

A conversation about power with Omidyar Network: We recently spoke on power—who has it, what it serves, and how we can deliver it to people of color—with Nicole Allred, Senior Communications Manager at Omidyar Network. “The biggest problem I see in philanthropy is that it does not honor people of color’s expertise and leadership,” Jeremie said. “And until philanthropic organizations are ready to do that with their dollars, then I don’t buy that they’re really about creating racial justice.”

The Black Woman's Guide to the COVID-19 Economy: We partnered with #BlackHer to produce “The Black Woman's Guide to the COVID-19 Economy,” which advances three structural policy ideas that will help Black women achieve economic liberation in the 21st century.
