

This Black History Month (and really every month!) we're pondering the role of race and racism in our economy. Racism is and continues to be profitable in this economy. Dismantling oppression requires our vigilance in calling out racialized capitalism as it shows up in many forms for Black and LatinX people, Asian immigrants and refugees and Native Americans. Here are pieces that are catching our attention.

Sorry, not sorry

Have you seen LibGen co-founder Jeremie Greer's provocative piece about White Discomfort? Check it out for a take on why the economic liberation of black people and people of color is a project in challenging White supremacy and comfort.

Reich and Rice

Solana joins former labor secretary Robert Reich and Katie Milne of Inequality Media for their new show: Common Good. In this episode they discuss everything from buybacks to basic income.

The Roots of Racial Wealth Inequality

In Don't Fixate on the Racial Wealth Gap: Focus on Undoing its Root Causes, Insight Center for Community Economic Development President, Roosevelt Fellow and advisor to LibGen, Anne Price examines how focusing on the root of racial wealth inequality rather than fixating on the racial wealth gap can help us build a path toward a fairer and more sustainable economic and political system.

Brand new flavor in your ear

At LibGen, we're often listening to podcasts while we're on the go. Lately, we've been delighting in More than Enough, by Mia Birdsong and The Nation. Subscribe for vivid storytelling about what communities of color think about a guaranteed income.

On that note, check out Jeremie's episode on the Basic Income Podcast.

Click here to listen to LibGen advisor, Darrick Hamilton on the Radical Imagination podcast by Angela Glover Blackwell discuss the feasibility of a federal jobs guarantee.

Upward and Onward,
LibGen
